

Chapter One
MOMENT OF DESTINY

THIS was the great moment the Chinese people had been suffering, fighting, and waiting for—year after bitter year. Japan collapsed and surrendered.

Enslaved China, so long under the Japanese heel, was free. And Free China, so long blockaded, was at last open to a new, peaceful world.

But that moment found the nation in greater danger and more deeply divided than ever—torn in two.

The drums of Japan's march of aggression ceased beating. But the angry rumble of China's internal conflict which had been ebbing and flowing as its steady accompaniment through fifteen years, did not die down. It rose. It threatened once again to swell into the frenzied fortissimo of open civil war.

Even before the Japanese laid down their arms, Chinese rushed to take them up to fight Chinese.

Would they still hesitate, desist? Would America and Russia unite in a decision to make them halt? Or would they fan the fire, unheeding of the consequences?

That fateful moment would decide the future of the hard-won peace of China—and of Asia and the world. . . .

The drama of disunity and confusion on China's political stage was floodlighted in a sudden, vivid flash—for all of us to see and, if possible, to comprehend its fateful meaning.

In the foreground—Chungking.

The drab wartime refuge of the internationally recognized National
