

THE NEW NORMAL WEATHER

Extreme weather conditions are causing chaos across the planet: tornadoes, wildfires, droughts and floods are happening across the world. Conditions which cause environmental disasters were once freak events but now they are the "new normal" weather.

Analysis of natural disasters in 140 countries shows that our climate really is becoming more extreme. While the number of geo-physical disasters (earthquakes and volcanic eruptions) is more or less constant, the disasters which flooding and storms cause are increasing. Most scientists say that extreme weather events will become more frequent, more common and more intense, and these events will increase in the future due to climate change. Climate change may also have a negative effect on people's health. Changes in temperature and rainfall, especially in developing countries, have serious consequences, including: the spread of disease, the destruction of homes, reduced food production, higher food prices.

For example, climate change particularly affects Asia, and the continent will have problems with water resources and grain production in the future. This will increase poverty and may even lead some countries to armed conflict.

What impact will climate change have on Earth in the future? What can we do personally to limit the damage to our planet? What will governments do to solve the problem of global warming? Will they act in time to protect the Earth for future generations?
