

COLLOIDAL ELECTROLYTES

When excess of an electrolyte is added to a sol, the dispersed particles are precipitated. The electrolyte furnishes both positive and negative ions in the medium. The sol particles adsorb the oppositely charged ions and get discharged. The electrically neutral particles then aggregate and settle down as precipitate

A negative ion (anion) causes the precipitation of a positively charged sol, and vice versa. The effectiveness of an anion or cation to precipitate a sol, will naturally depend on the magnitude of the charge or valence of the effective ion. From a study of the precipitating action of various electrolytes on particular sol, Hardy and Schulze gave a general rule.

“Hardy-Schulze Rule states that the precipitating effect of an ion on dispersed phase of opposite charge increases with the valence of the ion.”
