Death and the College Student Edwin S. Questions and Answers on College Student Suicide Gary Pavela, 2006 College Student Suicide Jennifer Kathleen Rice, 2014 College suicide rates are stable but up to 10% of students experience suicidal ideation each year and most do not access mental health services Little is known about campus mental health service structure and delivery In a mixed model quantitative to qualitative design this study examined the link between suicidal ideation mental health service use and suicide attempt using archival survey data of over 25 000 college students from 70 campuses collected in 2006 by the UT Austin based National Research Consortium of Counseling Centers in Higher Education Survey respondents had lower levels of 12 month suicidal ideation 6% than typical national rates and almost half of those with ideation had accessed mental health services The quantitative analysis included multiple psychosocial and demographic variables known to affect suicide risk an extension of prior college suicide research Bivariate and regression tests of association found that several health service variables for example seeing a counselor were significantly associated with higher rates of suicide attempt This seemingly counter intuitive finding was mostly driven by a group of high reactors Students with both significant distress and a higher tendency to access services The qualitative analysis sought to expand knowledge of what resources students use to cope with ideation including formal healthcare or informal sources of support and how this differed on two variables whether students had accessed services and whether they had made a suicide attempt. Survey respondents' open ended descriptions of what they found helpful or unhelpful during their suicidal crises were analyzed for common themes. Social support from friends and loved ones was more often reported by service users than non service users and was associated with lower attempt rates. Social interaction increased attempt rates if students described receiving unhelpful feedback such as shaming or minimization of their emotional state and this risk was greater for those students who also did not see any mental health provider. Another common theme that was associated with lower suicide attempt rates regardless of service use was the use of coping behaviors and skills such as talking problems through with a friend. These findings suggest areas of focus for future research and intervention for example mental health providers can guide students in recruiting appropriate social support. This study contributes to the understanding of how and whether suicidal students utilize campus mental health services and other sources of support which is needed for guiding policy on suicide prevention efforts and directing future research on service effectiveness. Campus level variables were also examined for differences in suicidal behaviors and service use with few differences found across the 70 campuses.

Reasons for Living in College Student Suicide Ideators and Non-ideators Leslie N. Jones, 1993 In Their Own Words

Kimberly K. Tran, 2010. Although the amount of interest and research on college student suicide has increased in recent years there remains a paucity of knowledge focused on issues of suicide for college students from diverse racial and ethnic backgrounds. This study aimed to expand the limited knowledge of Asian American college student suicide using archival data from a larger national study titled The Nature of Suicidal Crisis in College Students. The survey was administered collaboratively online by the National Research Consortium of Counseling Centers in Higher Education and included 70 U S colleges and universities. Guided by the interpersonal psychological theory of attempted and completed suicide and a cultural frame salient to Asian Americans this study employed qualitative research methods to capture the lived experience of fifty eight Asian American suicidal college students. More specifically the present investigation explored the factors that positively and negatively influenced Asian American college students with serious suicide ideation from progressing to behaviors with higher risk of lethality such as suicide attempts and completions. Findings from a culturally grounded phenomenological analysis of participants' narrative responses revealed protective factors including a a desire not to hurt or burden others b social support c fear d self reliance and assistance and e insight and meaning. Factors that participants found least helpful in resolving their suicidal crisis were a academics b lack of social support and c experiences with mental health providers. The results of this study provides information that should be of interest to mental health practitioners working with Asian American college students as well as have the potential to contribute towards the formulation of a theory for this specific ethnic minority group. Additionally it is the intention that these findings will enable design of both culturally appropriate
