Writing Reconstruction Sharon D. Kennedy-Nolle, 2015-05-04 After the Civil War the South was divided into five military districts occupied by Union forces Out of these regions a remarkable group of writers emerged Experiencing the long lasting ramifications of Reconstruction firsthand many of these writers sought to translate the era s promise into practice In fiction newspaper journalism and other forms of literature authors including George Washington Cable Albion Tourg e Constance Fenimore Woolson and Octave Thanet imagined a new South in which freedpeople could prosper as citizens with agency Radically re envisioning the role of women in the home workforce and marketplace these writers also made gender a vital concern of their work Still working from the South the authors were often subject to the whims of a northern literary market Their visions of citizenship depended on their readership s deference to conventional claims of duty labor reputation and property ownership The circumstances surrounding the production and circulation of their writing blunted the full impact of the period s literary imagination and fostered a drift into the stereotypical depictions and other strictures that marked the rise of Jim Crow Sharon D Kennedy Nolle blends literary history with archival research to assess the significance of Reconstruction literature as a genre Founded on witness and dream the pathbreaking work of its writers made an enduring if at times contradictory contribution to American literature and history Arkansas Libraries, 1987
