Decision Against War: Eisenhower and Dien Bien Phu, 1954. By MELANIE BILLINGS-YUN. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988. xvi, 199 pp. $25.00.

Melanie Billings-Yun writes about an early milestone on the American road into war in Vietnam, the project to save France from defeat in the Franco-Vietnamese phase of the conflict by American intervention. A critical early crisis in the development of the conflict, Dien Bien Phu has suffered in historiography, in particular relative to the Geneva Conference of 1954, of which this battle is the direct progenitor. In recent years declassification of U.S. government records has made it possible to study the intervention project from the secret records of the decision makers. This account is one of the results.

The author joins those historians reinterpreting Dwight D. Eisenhower's presidency, agreeing that he exercised strong leadership but did it with a hidden hand. In the Dien Bien Phu crisis, the author believes, Eisenhower enjoyed a success against considerable odds in his decision against intervention. Those odds consisted of pressures for intervention, principally from Admiral Arthur W. Radford, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The president accomplished this by relying on congressional leaders to erect barriers to intervention and then using these to control pressures on him to act.

One must question the manner in which this hidden-hand analysis of Eisenhower is presented here. It is clear that Eisenhower maneuvered behind the scenes to structure the milieu and issues for decision, but Billings-Yun construes the method as decision making by subterfuge. The down side, she writes, was that the method sent mixed signals, creating some of the president's problems, as at Dien Bien Phu. Excellent bridge player that he was, Eisenhower may have been masterful at concealing his cards, but this is not necessarily "subterfuge."

The evidence that the president's method may be overdrawn in this work can be seen in the declassified official record. The record is replete with evidence that the president remained serious about intervention far longer than previously thought, ultimately dissuaded by the notion that this was not the right intervention to make. Eisenhower posed tough conditions, but his intent was to make the effort work, not to prevent it. The urgency with which John Foster Dulles and Radford worked up to the very eve of the Geneva conference to cobble together a coalition, the discussion of a "loan" (misunderstood or not) of atomic weapons to France, the resuscitation of the air strike idea even after the fall of Dien Bien Phu (long after the imposition of the supposed "killer" conditions)—all fit well with the hypothesis that Eisenhower felt quite prepared to fight a war. In fact when the French Indochina crisis is put in the context of the Formosa Straits crises that immediately followed, the fit is even closer. Decision Against War isolates the Dien Bien Phu case, indeed practically down to the sole contingency of an air strike, not treating the Chinese aspect of the crisis at all and hardly touching the relationship between the intervention plan and the "massive retaliation" doctrine. Radford, it is argued, keeps pressing for intervention because he does not realize until much later that Eisenhower is not serious about it. This
