Exploring the Coping Strategy Skills of Homeless Women Bette-Lee M. Axiak, 2014 The fastest growing subgroup in the homeless population is families headed by single women National Coalition for the Homeless 2009 Rosenheck et al 1999 Hodnicki Horner Boyle 1992 These homeless mothers may use unique strategies that assist them through their experience of being homeless In order for there to be a better understanding of how to assist homeless mothers the coping mechanisms that are used by them must be identified Eight homeless mothers and two homeless fathers were recruited through a family shelter and community center in the County of Tuolumne The purpose of the study was to explore coping strategies of homeless mothers who had children between the ages of 0 and 18 Two fathers asked to participate in the study so their contributions are included The participants were between the ages of 21 to 39 Five participants were married and the remaining five were single at the time of the interviews There are four important findings that were revealed in this research study The first finding is that homeless parents go through similar phases of homelessness as non parenting homeless adults and they often use the same coping mechanisms in each phase of their homelessness denial substance abuse reliance on family and friends avoidance of available community resources Finding number two in the research was that regardless of age marital status or gender causes of homelessness are the same for homeless mothers and non mothers Some of these causes are poverty alcohol or drug use domestic violence weak social networks and an absence of knowledge about available resources in their communities The third finding was that hope is crucial in overcoming homelessness The fourth and final finding was that homeless mothers have unique needs such as the need for prenatal care assistance in giving birth parenting classes and child care when compared with all other subgroups of homeless populations Stoner 1983 Merves 1992 Rosenheck et al 1999 Therefore the focus of future research may not need to be on the coping mechanisms of homeless mothers but on their particular needs

Homeless Mothers ,2008 As affordable housing resources diminish in cities throughout the country poor families increasingly join the ranks of the homeless This study considers the question of whether there is an association between coping ability and adaptation and the conditions of homelessness for homeless mothers The research design involves in person interviews with 80 homeless mothers residing at a shelter for homeless families in New York City All were on public assistance at the time of the study had at least one child and had been at the shelter for no more than 4 months The study considers two types of coping problem focused which involves active efforts to address the stressor and emotion focused which involves directing attention away from the stressor through defensive mechanisms such as avoidance This study asked whether the type of coping problem focused or emotion focused is associated with the number of times that homeless families relocated the total amount of time that they were homeless and the number of concurrent stressful life events they faced in the 3 years prior to the study It also considered whether these three independent variables number of relocations duration of homelessness and number of life events were associated with adaptation to implicit and explicit shelter expectations Results indicate that homeless mothers who relocate four or more times utilize defensive emotion focused coping strategies more than mothers who relocate three times or less Additionally homeless mothers who have experienced 20 or more stressful life events utilize more emotion focused coping strategies than mothers who experience fewer than 20 stressful life events Policy makers and clinicians should incorporate the results of this study as well as others documenting the detrimental effects of frequent relocations and numerous stressful life events on the coping capacity of homeless mothers in designing social policy and clinical services for this population
