Van den Hamer, 1975-11-30 In the last few years the interest in the behavior and possible function of trace elements in biological systems has strongly increased This seems to be stimulated by three different factors i e 1 the slowly growing notion about the importance of some essential elements in the metabolism of plants and animals including man 2 the increasing extent of environmental contamination caused by the disposal of heavy elements both essential and toxic and 3 the increasing sensitivity achieved in the analysis of these elements by modern techniques The impact of the last mentioned development has been strong Enormous improvements have indeed been made in lowering the limits of sensitivity of analytical methods maintaining at the same time good precision Though there is a strong competition between some techniques neutron activation analysis shows special advantages for multi element analyses in organic materials As a result a relatively important part of the literature on trace element behavior in the biosphere though often phenomenologic in character can be found in journals and transactions of symposia involving radiochemistry This phenomenon does not readily stimulate the communication and scientific exchange with nutritional toxicological medical or biochemical experts who study the metabolic pathways of trace elements      Recent Progress in Solving Some Farm Problems of Illinois University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign.
