

USA?' These critical questions remain unanswered. The implication is that a greater understanding of these murders is urgently needed.

In conclusion the book is essential reading for anyone with a serious interest in the relationship between legal firearm ownership and violence, particularly within a UK context. Additionally, all the submissions are surprisingly readable. The book would also be very useful for anyone interested in the use (and abuse) of crime statistics as it provides wonderful examples of how statistics can be used to frame an argument and how such evidence can be criticised; for this reason alone it is a worthwhile purchase.

'Core Issues in Policing'

Edited by Frank Leishman, Barry Loveday and Stephen Savage
 (Longman, London; 1996; ISBN 0-582-24915-5; Pbk £13.99; pp. xiii + 237)

The early 1990s became a crucial time for policing when the relatively apolitical scientific management tools adopted during the 1980s became highly politicised by the incumbent Conservative Government. Their worst excesses were fended off, but the philosophies which they embraced have engendered a series of police reforms which will influence the way in which policing is carried out well into the next century. Trends such as new public management and privatisation have forced a re-evaluation of people's understanding of areas of public policy which have hitherto been regarded as state policy. Conceived during the middle of this uncertain period for policing and published in 1996, 'Core Issues in Policing', consists of 14 chapters, plus an introduction and conclusion, which explore, as the title suggests, a series of issues that are germane to policing and its future.

In their opening chapter Leishman, Cope and Storie usefully set the agenda for many of the subsequent chapters by describing the main changes that have taken place in the police policy-making process. In their analysis, they argue that a new policing order is emerging in which the traditional architecture of policing has been substantially reconstructed so that policing has ceased to be primarily a local service. Furthermore, central government has increased its influence over policing at the expense of local government. Yet, there are also many aspects of these changes which have led to the decentralisation or hollowing out of many policing functions. Policy-making powers have been displaced upwards by Europeanisation, downwards by decentralisation and outwards by privatisation. Most importantly, they conclude that this new policing order is irreversible.

Savage and Charman take these themes further by examining the pluralistic nature of their origins. In considerable detail they identify three almost separate streams of causality: fiscal, ideological and crime-
